For a little while, this world was ours. We walked the deserted streets, living in the huts and villages that sprung up after the all-pervading, pixilated, pea soup cloud of death consumed everything. Slowly, everything changed. Our world turned green and beautiful. Our nights became dark and our days bright and full of life. Our machines were created. We crafted our beautiful utopia. The end of our world was soon to come, we knew. The apocalypse was set to sweep over our society like a deadly cold wind from a distant world. To prevent this terrible doom, the world's leaders drew together and invited us to join them in the construction of this great device: A Global EMP Device. With this machine they were to send a small swarm of artificial satellites into space. These satellites, none of which looked like anything that had ever flown before, would travel across the planet's atmosphere, detonate and, by the virtue of their nuclear detonation, destroy all electronic systems in a cone shaped area ten degrees wide. The quarantine zone would last years, but it would, in the end, prove to be far too small a distance to contain this catastrophic outbreak. But this was only just the beginning. We were told to take up our place at our desks with our software and, after that, to launch our potato devices into space. Our world would forever be changed. Our future, we were told, was a world without electricity. Our nights would be dark and our days bright. It would be our world, ultimately. But we were not alone in this. The World Health Organization and many other humanitarian and political institutions sent representatives into space and began to establish a launch site. We were told, with gravity and truth in our hearts, that this might seem like an unimportant footnote to history. But, to us, it was an act of war. We were children, born into a new world, and we would no longer be kept safe by electronic devices. For this, we would have to send our own revenge. This was our role. And we would find far more than we had expected. We found mysteries. We found the creatures that had attacked us, the viruses and parasites that stole our air, and the spectral beings that brought chaos to our planet. But we found also the faces of our parents, our siblings, and even our dead loved ones. They had been enslaved by the geomagnetic anomalies that almost wiped our world from the map. We found a

Q: Pragmatic approach for migrating to a new platform We have an established application that is created using .NET 4.0 framework. It is an Enterprise application developed by our company. We have recently signed a new MSDN Subscription. With this change we have to do the following to keep our application running: Recompile the DLL. Recompile the project. Replace all references to all references to .NET 4.0 framework with .NET 4.5.3 framework. Make any other configuration changes needed to keep the solution working on the new machine. Question: Can we safely deploy the compiled version over our client's machine and avoid these steps listed above. A: If you already signed a subscription then you're already using .NET 4.5.3 (as the current versions are available through an MSDN subscription). But this does not mean that all of the .NET 4.0 features are still supported by .NET 4.5.3. For example any "new" features you added could not be fully supported. You should also consider compatibility problems that might arise if you reuse your (current) code to target .NET 4.5.3. Anything depending on 4.0 features might break unless you write your code for .NET 4.5.3. Giraffe Simulator is a short, experimental game with an added sandbox component. In Giraffe Simulator, you shrink down to the size of an atom and shrink every particle around you. A growing crowd of particles with different speeds will follow your shrinking skeleton. As you shrink, your atoms will start to slow down and you must collect them in an atom trap. A collection of particles becomes a living creature which will become angry when the number of particles exceeds a certain threshold. Then the hunter will turn to become the hunted! The mechanism of this game was designed based on the theory of swarms as described in the paper "Heterogeneous particle swarms with two species," by Ghosh et al. (2013) The game mechanics in this game are not based on well-established literature. The main inspirations for game mechanics come from the papers "Swarm Intelligence: From Game Theory to Natural Systems" by Voelcker (2010) and "Swarm AI" by Ouzounov (2013). A metagame which is responsible for the sandbox is based on the same literature. Gameplay: The main mechanics of Giraffe Simulator are: Particle Shrinking: When a particle gets close to a trap, it will shrink. This shrink increases the speed of the particle, decreases the radius, and increases the chances of the particle becoming trapped. Particle Shrink Walk: While you shrink, your particles can "walk" in the surrounding particles. Particles can walk in each other, which is why it is a push-pull dynamics. You can understand it as the pressure pushes particles towards you, while pulls back the particles. In Giraffe Simulator you can also make a particle walk away from you (i.e. back to the particle it came from). You do this by pushing the particle away. Traps: The traps are large particles which are "trapped" in a smaller size. If you shrink too close to a trap, a collection of particles which form a giant particle will start to follow you. These giant particles (i.e. the swarm) will become angry when the swarm reaches a certain size. When this happens, the swarm will chase you in the opposite direction as you shrunk. The swarm will also try to capture and throw you into the trap. When you enter a trap, you stay in the trap. Only if you collect your atoms around the trap will you become free again. Part
