3D modelling and rendering technology Shape3d is a 3D modeling and rendering technology platform developed by Schaeffler. It is used to prepare 3D models for different types of 3D rendering, such as 3D printing, visualization, and interactive applications. Source code The source code of the Shape3d v8.1 can be downloaded from the Schaeffler website. This is a fair assumption, because if you asked a fan to explain what sort of baseball game they were in attendance for last night in San Diego, the only thing you would come up with is “San Diego Padres at Seattle Mariners,” so ingrained is this particular MLB marketing campaign into our regional consciousness. For context, the Padres are currently 21 games below .500 and — like Seattle and Kansas City — have recently relocated from a Padres-friendly stadium to a less hospitable environment. So where, pray tell, did those tiny colored dots come from? It appears as if the ball was scrubbed clean of its usual green and red coloring before being resprayed. In any event, the result is pretty weird and also represents a good example of the disconnect between marketing and actual production values. Here’s what happened last night: If we leave aside the fact that the crew responsible for this promotional stunt should have used a more dilute paint mixture that allows the ball to still show some of the original color, is this really an appropriate way to present the new San Diego Padres logo? The mark is, apparently, supposed to be a miniaturized version of that logo that adorns the ball itself, but the club went even further than that. It was so small that it only appeared to show up on television. If you were seeing the double-header at stadium, it was replaced with a standard Padres hat logo. It's not often that we get to connect the dots between a corporate function and the actual conditions of the game you're watching. More than a few colleagues have 6d1f23a050
