The Airmail Beta 3 brings some serious

improvements to the email sending process of Android, and it's only the latest version in a long series of fixes, updates and enhancements.

Android 4.3 version had an assortment of fixes to address various software issues, the battery life on

LG G2 was improved

with the latest version, and the auto-update

system was improved as well. This update also brought performance improvements and overall polish for the app. There are a number of bug fixes and performance improvements, but perhaps most important is that Airmail 3 introduces an auto-retry system for sending email in case a temporary network issue interrupts the process. This has been an issue with several other email apps, and is a massive improvement. After initial installation, the app will notify you when the update is available and you can update to it, or wait for the next update, or install it in safe-mode to check for some issues. For the latter you will need to select the Airmail app from the 'Manage Apps' section, and then select the 'Advanced' option. If you have Airmail installed already, you need to select the 'Update' option and it will download the new update, and then install. However, if you want to update right now, you can always download the APK file from APKmirror and manually install it.

Alternatively, you can also use the official update APK that is available here. But what about the features of the app? Let's start with the auto-retry feature.

Airmail uses the SMTP protocol to send email from the server. The SMTP protocol is not only used for email sending, but also for reporting the mail delivery process to the server. Airmail was previously not able to detect if the connection was interrupted in the middle of sending, or simply if the server was unresponsive, or that the connection went through. With version 3, Airmail introduces an auto-retry system. This works like this: After
